"The article purports to examine the philosophical speculations of Dinnaga, a Buddhist logician who lived in India during the Fifth century A.D. After a brief historical introduction describing the development of the idealistic school of Buddhism, the teachings of Dinnaga are compared with those of Vasubandhu and the points of difference noted. The arguments adduced by Dinnaga in refutation of the realist theory of perception are then compared with those of the Western philosopher, Berkeley. This has led to the conclusion that Dinnaga presented a theory of immaterialism comparable to that propounded by Berkeley."
